

The Green House
Lowry, LA

HISTORY

A large, green, two story, Acadian style home resides in a part of Louisiana known to the locals as Lowry. Originally built by Alexandre Hebert, and his wife Clarisse, sometime between the 1830' s-1840' s. Mr. Hebert was a cattleman in those days. They are believed to have had nine children, three of which never made it to adulthood. The house is said to have had a very busy history since. It is said that Jean Lafitte would anchor in the Lake Arthur river behind the house to deliver slaves, and Jim Bowie would pick them up in wagons and haul them away. It is said that Franciscan Monks inhabited the house during the 20th century. Later it was used as a drop off point for bootleggers, and even later used as a brothel. The house is in the process of restoration. Claims have been, shadows seen allover property, doors slamming shut, the sound of boots and spurs walking up and down stairs.

Laspirits SW, and SC chapters began investigating the house around eight p.m. that night. Several Large Oaks engulf the property with flowing Moss. With the night being a little windy, and the house having a metal roof, the acorns made their presence known from time to time catching everyone off guard. A male voice was heard on the second floor by several investigators. Later in the night a scream was heard by one investigator, although several were in the same room. Later to be validated by recorders. Just as the investigators were about to call it quits, around three a. m., a screen door which was propped open in the middle room, on the first floor; for some unexplained reason, slammed shut. During the night, sounds resembling footsteps were heard as well. Several pieces of audio were collected.
